Do not be alarmed at the seriousness of the indication: do not anticipate a tedious sermon: I shall be brief, and will endeavour not to be prosy. True religion requires not many precepts: it is comprised wholly in these two grand and beautiful ideas, the existence of a God, and the immortality of the soul, and in that pure morality which was taught by the Saviour of men. The most worthy homage that we can pay to the Supreme Being, consists in making a good use of time, and in rendering all the services we can to our fellow creatures. Yet, whatever may be your religious creed, sect, or persuasion, be assured that your time will not pass either smoothly or profitably, unless you seek and receive the blessing of your Maker upon you daily. In the evening, recall the day, and the hours, and see wherein you may have fallen short of duty, and what you have done, or omitted doing, which your conscience, that unerring monitor, tells you should have been done. Every man, at night, can tell whether he have made, or squandered, or lost property during the day; and so every one, by proper care, can tell whether he have gone backward or forward in disciplining his heart at the close of every day. More especially, when you have enjoyed the soothing rest of the Sabbath, retire and review the week that is past. Never lose sight...
