On the 19th of March, at peace with all men, and with the most triumphant manifestation of the approbation of his Master, he closed the labours of thirty-three years in the vineyard of the Lord. Of his eminent domestic virtues, a well-ordered family, united in the bonds of the most tender affection, are to this day living witnesses. While his zeal for the divine law, and his love for the souls of men, impelled him to express his disapprobation of every form of moral evil, and fearlessly to administer the discipline of the church, the exquisite sensibility of his own feelings made him a model of courtesy to all men, and tempered the edge of his reproof with the most affectionate tenderness. The duty of praying with his family was never, after his marriage, omitted by him but once; and so highly did he value the privilege of uniting with them around the domestic altar, that he uniformly requested, whoever might be a visitant at his house, to permit him once a day to lead in their devotions. Eminently a man of peace himself, he breathed the peaceful spirit of Christianity everywhere around him; and especially upon his family, and upon the church in his vicinity, he impressed this characteristic mark of Christianity in a very high degree. Full of sympathy, his generosity and hospitality abounded toward all men; but especially toward that body of men in connection with...
